Many people may have heard of the term “person-centered” and assumed they knew what it meant. Others may not have clue. A common misconception of being person-centered is that you recklessly give the person anything they want or let them do anything they want with no regard to risk or endangerment. Nothing could be farther from the truth! Being person-centered is about seeking a responsible balance between what is important TO the person and what is important FOR the person. This means supporting the person on an individual level by educating and informing them about decisions, consequences, and possible outcomes. To change our systems and mentalities from being service oriented to person oriented will take time and require various levels of change. That change will be required throughout the entire system... and it can start with you!
